- on Tuesday, the Director-General of Jordan University Hospital, inaugurated the first awareness booth for colon cancer, organized by a team of clinical-year medical students from the School of Medicine interested in gastroenterology (UJ-GIG). The students provided a simplified explanation about cancer, highlighting the "Jordan Challenges Cancer" campaign in collaboration with the King Hussein Cancer Center, which aims to raise awareness in the local community about the importance of prevention, mental health care, and the necessity of regular early screening tests that save lives. They also emphasized the importance of combating all forms of smoking, as it is linked to about 13 types of cancer, most notably colon and rectal cancer.

This awareness booth, under the slogan "Together for Better Digestive Health," will continue throughout March, with sessions held twice a week. It aims to raise awareness about colon cancer and the essential screenings that help in its early detection, such as a colonoscopy every 10 years after the age of 50 or a fecal occult blood test, which is recommended annually after the age of 50. The booth also distributed brochures to educate the public on these matters.

The students stressed the need for a national program for colon cancer to detect people diagnosed at an early stage, even before symptoms appear, which increases the chances of successful treatment. Additionally, they highlighted the importance of detecting and removing polyps in the colon to prevent.

- The Women's Studies Center participated in the launch of the national awareness campaign "No Silence or Tolerance for Violence Against Women and Girls."

The University of Jordan participated in the launch of the national awareness campaign "No Silence and No Tolerance for Violence Against Women and Girls," which aimed to raise awareness of combating violence against women and girls in Jordan. The campaign was held during a press conference organized by the Euro-Mediterranean Feminist Initiative. Professor Amal Al-Awawdeh participated in a discussion session on strengthening national dialogue on the need to raise awareness and change public attitudes toward violence against women and girls. The campaign addresses the challenges facing efforts to combat violence against women and girls, including gender stereotypes, social tolerance, impunity, victim blaming, and the need for stronger victim protection mechanisms. The campaign engages local communities to take preventative measures and informs victims of available services. The number of participants reached 70 people and 4 implementers.
